BACKGROUND

At United Way of King County, we believe that education is a key strategy to ensure that youth of all races, ethnicities, cultures and genders grow up capable of achieving success in an ever-changing world. We support students through a continuum of education from early years through middle school and into college. And we support learning that incorporates the rich culture, diversity and heritage of our many communities into our students’ education.

What are we doing? We made an investment in the whole young person not just the one that shows up for the school day. So we sought to build a program led by community-based organizations, that help empower and nurture youth of color and their families, who are their first and most important teachers.

How are we doing it? We started funding the work of the Racial Equity Coalition (REC), a self-formed group of 14 Black, Indigenous and other organizations of color (BIPOC) committed to giving BIPOC youth a holistic education by addressing needs and concerns unique to those youth. REC has launched an after-school program that fosters love and liberation and reinforces students’ cultural identity by immersing them in lessons rooted in their own races, ethnicities and heritage.

WHY THIS WORKS

Based on listening in the community and our work in real time, we know that when youth weave together the strengths of the dominant culture with their own history, they do better in school and in life. This strong personal identity increases the relevance of school subjects, builds resilience, and empowers youth to navigate a school culture that does not positively reflect their identity back to them.

“I’ve definitely become more outspoken and confident in youth organizing. I became more independent and got used to taking initiative more often.”

99% of Racial Equity Coalition program participants reported having developed a positive cultural identity.

92% of Racial Equity Coalition program participants reported developing a sense of belonging to their schools and/or communities.

In addition, young people in REC after-school programs also report learning how to better advocate for themselves and others.

THE FUNDING

REC uses a participatory grantmaking approach that allows coalition members to determine how to prioritize and allocate funding. For some organizations, this can help shift the dynamic of competition that divides communities into collaboration.

“[REC programming] has done so much for us, especially with school supplies, homework help, forming groups that help students do their homework, leadership classes, drop-out prevention and drug prevention. It also makes it possible for their parents to learn the same classes so they can work together to be successful at any school.”
